How soon will it be before robots become so intelligent that they will be able to do jobs which at the moment only human beings can do, such as cleaning the house, or looking after patients in hospital? Some experts believe this will happen within twenty years while others disagree.

One London company has already developed machines that can be used as "home-helpers" for old people who are unable to look after themselves and are living on their own. These machines can now do such things as cook eggs and cut the grass, and the company says that future models will accept simple voice instructions and be controlled by a "brain". The director of UAS, Mr. Henry Jeffry, believes that in the next five to ten years companies will have developed even more sophisticated robots for use in industry. By this time it is likely that they will also have begun to sell new forms of these machines into ordinary homes.

But Dr. Lomax, who has done research into artificial intelligence at Sussex University, believes we have a long way to go before we can develop truly intelligent machines.

His opinion is that preparing a fried egg may seem easy enough. But suppose one of the eggs has gone bad. Even the most "intelligent" robot would probably still use it. If something slightly unusual needs doing, something that requires even a little bit of ordinary human imagination, a robot is useless. They need programming for even the simplest of tasks and are incapable of learning from experience.

1. All experts agree that we can develop truly intelligent robots.

- _____ 2. There is a London company that already makes special robots which can help old people to do certain jobs in the home.
- _____ 3. This company hopes to make a robot soon that will respond to spoken orders.
